acidosis, whatever its cause, is reduction in serum bicarbonate (HCO_3^-) concentration. This may be due to increased utilization of bicarbonate in buffering abnormal accumulation of acids, increased loss of bicarbonate from the body, or inadequate regeneration of bicarbonate by the kidneys. In contrast to distal type I or classic renal tubular acidosis (RTA) that is associated with hypokalemia, hyperkalemic forms of RTA also occur usually in the setting of mild-to-moderate CKD.

Hyperkalemic Forms of Renal Tubular Acidosis: Clinical and

This volume is a very well-referenced summation of lactic acidosis, covering the biochemistry and physiology in much detail, but intelligible to clinicians having some current familiarity with metabolism.

Renal tubular acidoses (RTAs) are forms of metabolic acidoses that are thought to arise from a lack of urine excretion of protons or loss of bicarbonate (HCO_3^-) due to a variety of tubular disorders. Characteristically, this causes a hyperchloraemic (non-anion gap) acidosis without impaired glomerular filtration.

The subject of lactic acidosis is not unlike the subject of sex in that many people are interested in both subjects and very few know much about either. This book is a superb collation of the published information about lactic acid metabolism and lactic acidosis. The fact that many aspects of this ...

Clinical and Biochemical Aspects of Lactic Acidosis

Although ketoacidosis is a form of metabolic acidosis because of the addition of acids, it is discussed separately in this chapter to emphasize the metabolic and biochemical issues required to understand the clinical aspects of this disorder (see margin note). We discuss the metabolic setting that is required to allow for the formation of ...
