niaâ€™s plants and animals. Consequently, the organiza-tional approach based on biomes is no longer embraced by scientists who search for a realistic understanding of Californiaâ€™s living landscapes. It only serves as a starting point in our study. Knowledge of speciï-c habitats is also critical in the study of the distribution of plants and animals.

Animals can be divided on the basis of an ecological criterion (i.e. in relation to the environments in which they live) into marine, freshwater and terrestrial organisms. In between the first two there should be the organisms that live in brackish waters, waters of passage between salty waters and freshwaters.

The distribution of many animal species will be particularly affected by climate change if habitat fragmentation impedes their movement to more suitable climatic conditions. Northward and uphill movements are taking place two to three times faster than reported earlier.

from animal behavior to derive a substantive conclusion about animal consciousness that ultimately validates the proposals of many cognitive ethologists, albeit on different grounds. All the while, however, my method of inquiry will be philosophical in nature, and I will attend to 1 I discuss examples of such experiments in chapter 2.
