Abstract does not appear. First page follows. Introduction The common fig occurs in a great number of varieties, which have evolved mainly as natural seedlings during the many centuries in which this fruit has been under cultivation. As early as the fourth century B.C., (Theophrastus (1916))⁴ reported that most good fruits, including the fig, had received names.

The lack of break through has been due to under utilization of genetic variability for superior quality and high yield potential. We report the extent of genetic diversity and relationships among 22 putative Ziziphus mauritiana varieties using nuclear ribosomal DNA and RAPD polymorphism. A hybrid protocol of DNA isolation was developed to obtain high molecular weight DNA.
