cross-cultural comparison that aims to identify cultural patterns. Schwartz (2011) advocated measuring culture through proverbs and popular books (p. 314). He did not explain how exactly such measurements could be taken, and there is no known sound methodology for comparing texts for the purpose of quantitative hologeistic cross-cultural analysis. Many proverbs are culture specific.

In Comparing the Incomparable, Marcel Detienne challenges the cordoning off of disciplines that prevent us from asking trans-cultural questions that would permit one society to shed light on another. Some years ago, he undertook the study of "construction sites" grouped around general questions to be put to historians and ethnologists about their particular areas of expertise.
