Acute brain damage can cause major disturbances of consciousness, ranging all the way to the persistent vegetative state (PVS), which is also known as "unresponsive wakefulness syndrome". PVS can be hard to distinguish from a state of minimal preserved consciousness (minimally conscious state, MCS); the rate of misdiagnosis is high and has been estimated at 37-43%.

three distinct stages of degraded consciousness have been described: coma, the vegetative state, and the minimally conscious state. Differentiation between the stages is based on behavioural criteria. Patients in the vegetative state differ from those in a coma because they can be aroused, yet both groups are considered fully unconscious.
