Constructing nuclear strategic discourse : the South Asian

The global discourse on nuclear weapons has been dominated for a number of decades by arguments that these weapons ensure inter-State security. The doctrine of nuclear deterrence proposes that the possession of nuclear weapons by some States introduces higher levels of caution into relations between States, lowering the likelihood of conflict.

survivors in nuclear protest literature and film urged identification and action, constructing an alternative to the cold, rational language of strategic discourse. In the 1980s, nuclear protesters began to call for nothing less than a transformation of human consciousness and community, from Jonathan Schell's urgent "Let us connect" to Helen

Radioactive Body Politics: AIDS as Nuclear Text

The study of political discourse, like that of other areas of discourse analysis, covers a broad range of subject matter, and draws on a wide range of analytic methods. Perhaps more than with other areas of discourse, however, one needs at the outset to consider the reflexive and potentially ambiguous nature of the term political discourse.
