Common to all retinal degenerative diseases is the damage to photoreceptor cells of the retina, which malfunction and disappear. The photoreceptor cells are the light sensing cells of the retina, the delicate nerve layer that lines the back of the eye.

Stem cell therapy has been effective in preclinical models of retinal degenerative disease, including models of RP and Stargardt macular dystrophy (See Table 5). Stem cells are being used in human clinical trials to treat degenerative retinal diseases, including Stargardt macular dystrophy, AMD and RP (See Table 6) .

Stargardt disease is the most common form of inherited juvenile macular degeneration. The progressive vision loss associated with Stargardt disease is caused by the death of photoreceptor cells in the central portion of the retina called the macula.

Common retinal diseases and conditions include: Retinal tear. A retinal tear occurs when the clear, gel-like substance in the center of your eye (vitreous) shrinks and tugs on the thin layer of tissue lining the back of your eye (retina) with enough traction to cause a break in the tissue. It's often accompanied by the sudden onset of symptoms such as floaters and flashing lights. Retinal detachment.

The retina is a layer of tissue in the back of your eye that senses light and sends images to your brain. In the center of this nerve tissue is the macula. It provides the sharp, central vision needed for reading, driving and seeing fine detail. Retinal disorders affect this vital tissue.

Anomalies of the Retina. Degenerative diseases of the retina can cause gradual loss of visual acuity and may be extremely difficult to diagnose in young children (Table 6-1). Unlike congenital retinal dysfunction that leads to large-amplitude nystagmus, marked vision impairment, and clear-cut electroretinographic findings, retinal degeneration in older children may be insidious in onset, unaccompanied by significant visual symptoms and with equivocal findings on electroretinography.
