A quick test is to wipe along the infected leaf or stem with a white cloth, tissue or finger and look for the "rust" stain. The characteristic colours of the rusts are freshest in the morning when new spores of stripe rust appear distinctly yellow.

experiment was conducted to assess the effect of environment on wheat varieties' yellow rust resistance and yield performance at three locations, Sinana, Agarfa and Ginir in Bale in 2012 main cropping season.

Effects of Environment on Wheat Varieties' Yellow Rust

Yellow rust caused by Puccinia striiformis f. sp. hordei is an important disease of barley (Hordeum vulgare L.) in some parts of the world. We compared the effectiveness of different types of resistance in field plots at Ardabil Agricultural Research Station (Iran) during 2010-2011.

Effect of yellow rust on yield components of barley

Environment had a significant effect on epidemic development of yellow rust through its effect on growth and progress rate of the pathogen. The test locations were different in their weather variables and created significant difference ($p \leq 0.05$) in yellow rust severity among the varieties.

The effects of stripe rust on N yield found in this study were thus most likely due to reduced uptake of N during grain filling. The largest effects of stripe rust on N yield relative to N input were seen in 2006, which was the year with greater yield.

stripe rust mainly occurs in temperate regions and areas of high elevation in tropical regions. The disease can start very early in the crop season and, therefore, can cause more severe damage in some areas than leaf rust [Puccinia triticina Eriks.] and stem rust [Puccinia graminis Pers.:Pers. f. sp. tritici Eriks. & E.
