2. Early History of Effects on Wire-Line Telegraph Communications The effects of the solar-terrestrial environment on communications technologies began long before the space age. In 1847, during the 8th solar cycle, telegraph systems that were just beginning to be deployed were found to frequently exhibit "anomalous currents" flowing in their wires.

Space Weather Effects on Communications

Unlike the impacts caused by terrestrial weather, space weather events on the human scale are often much more subtle, and change with the particular technology being used. There are, for example, no known space weather events in the public literature that have directly led to the loss of human life.

Space Weather Impacts, Mitigation and Forecasting space weather has a negligible impact on technology and humans but on average several times in each solar cycle of 11 years space weather can have operational impact.
