model, its geologic setting, and the surficial environment. Both greenfield and brownfield exploration contributed to the discovery of major gold deposits (>2.5 moz Au) in the last decade but the discovery rates have declined significantly.

istics, as expressed in the models and model codes, would be expected to have a similar geochemical expression, and hence be amenable to similar exploration procedures.

GEOCHEMICAL DISPERSION, PROCESS AND EXPLORATION MODELS

Models that describe problem-solving processes should be developed with students so they understand the recurring nature of solving real-world problems (as part of a problem is solved, new problems arise and some steps in the processes recur).

ment model of working memory (Baddeley and Hitch, 1974). The reported results and the method developed have led to a wealth of empirical research that has enabled further testing and development of the model. The initial model presented by Baddeley and Hitch (1974) proposed the existence of three functional components of working memory (Fig. 1).
