A Course in Flow Visualization: the Art and Physics of Fluid Flow, presented at the American Society for Engineering Education 2004 Annual Conference won the "Best Paper" PIC III award at the conference.

ing images, the method is named Image Based Flow Visualization (IBFV). With IBFV a wide variety of visualization techniques can be emulated. Flow can be visualized as moving textures with line integral convolution and spot noise. Arrow plots, streamlines, particles, and topological images can be generated by adding extra dye to the image.

Techniques for visualizing the flow of fluids have long been sought to aid in designing experiments and to help interpret measurements from local point probes.

a. Physics-based optical flow equation Flow visualization techniques use tracers (such as particles and dyes) or on the change of certain physical properties of fluid (such as the density). Digital images of flow visualization are obtained by using cameras that detect radiation with a certain wavelength bandwidth from a fluid medium in a flow.

Particle Image Velocimetry (PIV) is a non-intrusive flow visualization technique and is now firmly established as a powerful fluid dynamics tool to measure flow velocity

SMART IMAGE PROCESSING OF FLOW VISUALIZATION

A new method for the visualization of two-dimensional fluid flow is presented. The method is based on the advection and decay of dye. These processes are simulated by defining each frame of a flow animation as a blend between a warped version of the previous image and a number of background images.
