

growth dissolution and pattern pdf

Growth and dissolution processes are of fundamental importance in any geological system, and they occur both near and far away from thermodynamic equilibrium.

Growth, Dissolution and Pattern Formation in Geosystems

Growth and dissolution kinetics are controlled by processes taking place at atomic and molecular scales. However, these processes may affect the patterns that form on a much larger scale in geosystems through the coupling with transport and/or deformation processes (Barber and Meredith, 1990; Lichtner et al., 1996).

The p H in the extrapallial fluid of the bivalve decreases when the valves are closed, and the amount of dissolution of shell is related to the duration of valve closure. Scanning electron micrographs of sections of the prismatic shell of the bivalve Mercenaria mercenaria reveal narrow subdaily growth striations.
