1) Discuss the various families of growth factors and their signaling mechanisms. 2) Discuss the general roles of growth factors in regulating embryogenesis. 3) Provide specific examples of developmental actions of growth factors. 4) Appreciate the complexity of growth factor signaling mechanisms that govern development.

Through the study of the molecular biology of PDGF, the role of oncogenes in cell transformation and their relationship to growth factors is beginning to be understood.

FGFs (fibroblast growth factors) and their receptors (FGFRs) play essential roles in tightly regulating cell proliferation, survival, migration and differentiation during development and adult life. Deregulation of FGFR signalling, on the other hand, has been associated with many developmental syndromes, and with human cancer.

Growth factors can be plant derived or human derived; however, various countries have regulations in place that ban the use of human derived growth factors. By supplementing these normal growth factors, there can be a natural repair of the skin.

Many growth factors are quite versatile, stimulating not only cell growth but also cellular division in numerous different cell types, while others are specific to a particular cell-type. Cytokines are a class of signaling proteins that are used extensively in cellular communication, immune function and embryogenesis.
