1 Applying evolutionary theory to human behaviour The application of evolutionary theory to the study of human behaviour has a long and contentious history (Boakes 1984; Laland and Brown 2011).

Applying evolutionary theory to human behaviour: past modern human behavior is almost totally learned and cultural, it rests on a biological base. It is expressed in the brains and bodies of actual human beings. These brains and bodies were shaped by the process of evolution. Evolution has shaped our behavior, our capacity for culture, and the nature of that culture.
