Abstract. The paper describes how 3D-based visualization and interaction techniques can be used in information retrieval user interfaces. It demonstrates that information retrieval systems based on state of the art retrieval models can be supplied with an intuitive interface functionality by applying the cone-tree metaphor for the visualization of content spaces.

retrieval user interfaces can improve retrieval efficiency and raise user satisfaction. To achieve this goal a fully featured geographic information retrieval user interface was designed, implemented, and integrated on a Portuguese research search engine. The user interface was evaluated using a user centred methodology, which shown that supporting Robustness of security of information Security of information sources is obviously a difficult issue with information retrieval technology on the Web because of its characteristic of openness. Security can be achieved by specifying the source ontology or limiting the access ability of an agent in IIR.

a unified interface for integrating information retrieval

In conventional Boolean retrieval systems, users have difficulty controlling the amount of output obtained from a given query. This paper describes the design of a user interface which permits gradual enlargement or refinement of the user's query by browsing through a graph of term and document subsets.

areas: multi-modal interfaces, interfaces for information retrieval, and intelligent environments. The motivation for building FIRE (the Friendly Information Retrieval Engine) was three fold: first, we wanted to build a very natural and effective information retrieval interface. Second, we wanted to demonstrate new Neural networks have recently been proposed for the construction of navigation interfaces for Information Retrieval systems. In this paper, we give an overview of some current research in this area. Most of the cited approaches use (variants) of the well-known Kohonen network. The Kohonen network ...
