According to Vedanta, the mind occupies an intermediate position between the knowing Self and the body. This physical body is not the whole of human personality.

MIND According to Vedanta _ Tattvaloka Online | Self | Mind

An individual's happiness or misery depends not so much on his material possessions or mastery over external nature as on the way his mind responds to life's challenges. Our physical, intellectual, aesthetic, moral and spiritual development depends on a proper understanding and cultivation of the mind.

Mind According to Vedanta – Vedanta Society of St. Louis

Mind is chidAbhAsha (the reflection of consciousness). So, when there is no reflection of any object in mind (as during deep sleep or in swoon), the western philosophers, psychologists and scientists surmise lack of consciousness. For Vedanta, however, the prajna (the consciousness) is never not present.

According to advaita vedanta the mind is a subtle substance (dravya). It is neither atomic nor infinite in size, but it is said to be of madhyama parinama, medium size, which may be taken to mean that it pervades the body of the particular jiva to which it belongs. The mind of each jiva is different.
