infrared (IR) data; within OB2 of the star the UVemission projects a morphology reminiscent of the IR torus, but it is a factor of 10 smaller. This "little torus" seen in the UV may be related to the "Little Homunculus" discovered recently, signifying recurrent mass ejections with the same geometry.

carinae. Sampling is begun in the lower lobe basilar segments and then proceeds apically, sampling only one lung per bronchoscopy. Thus, samples are obtained from the carinae of large and small cartilaginous airways only. INHERENT LIMITATIONS OF BRONCHIAL BIOPSY One major limitation of bronchial biopsy is that random sampling of the airway is not possible.

We discuss the comparative spatial morphology of the bipolar lobes, the "skirt" defined by the equatorial ejecta, and the bright features in the core. We derive separate color temperature values of 200, 240, and 420 K for the bipolar lobes, skirt, and core, respectively.

The nebula around Î· Carinae consists of an inner bipolar structure, historically called the Homunculus, and the outer ejecta consisting mainly of a variety of knots of different sizes.

Abstract We present a high-resolution image of  $\eta$ -Car. Together with IR and visual observations of the central arcsecond, we use this to discuss the morphological structure of  $\eta$ -Car on the different length scales.

The overall morphology does not correspond to any one normal spectral type but suggests a composite of features seen in B-type supergiants in the range B2 Ia to B8 Ia, with additional lower temperature lines also present.
