Neritic Carbonate Sediments in a Temperate Realm

Marine carbonate sedimentation (Bathurst, 1975; Scholle et al., 1983; Tucker and Wright, 1990; James and Kendall, 1992; Wright and Burchette, 1996) takes place in two environments, the benthic, neritic realm and the pelagic deep-sea realm (see Oceanic Sediments). Neritic carbonate sediments are âœbornâœ as precipitates or skeletons within the depositional environment.

Upwelling there provides nutrients to support the planktic and pelagic communities and the observed distribution of benthic invertebrate communities that lead to the formation of neritic carbonate sediments.
