Planation surface, any low-relief plain cutting across varied rocks and structures. Among the most common landscapes on Earth, planation surfaces include pediments, pediplains, etchplains, and peneplains. There has been much scientific controversy over the origins of such surfaces. Because genetic implications are so often associated with various names, it seems best to refer to these features ...

In geology and geomorphology a planation surface is a large-scale surface that is almost flat with the possible exception of some residual hills. The processes that form planation surfaces are labelled collectively planation and are exogenic (chiefly erosion).

The Puzzle of Planation Surfaces . During the Retreating Stage of the Flood, the mountains rose and the valleys (basins) sank (Psalm 104:8) and the Floodwater receded off the continents. This great tectonic movement caused the Floodwater that entirely covered the Earth at Day 150 to retreat off the soon-to-be

Some planation surfaces are dated to well over 100 million years old, despite the fact that current erosion rates should have destroyed the surface within a few million years at most (see 1 King, L.C., 1967).

Planation surface is an omnibus term and includes the Davisian peneplain (q.v.) or peneplane, the panplane, the pediment and pediplain, the wave-cut platform, etch plains, stripped or structural plains, savanna plains, periglacial pediments, berms and straths.

Planation surfaces in the Armorican Massif, have been mapped by de Martonne (1906), Musset (1922), Guilcher (1948; 1949) and Klein (1975). In these classic studies, most authors agreed on the existence of several planation surfaces with ages ranging from the Mesozoic for the most Planation surfaces have attracted a great deal of interest among geomorphologists (e.g., Acad, des Sciences de PURSS, UNESCO, UGI1974). In all crystalline basement environments, and especially in cratonic regions, expanses of flat or gently undulating surfaces of planation occupy a large part of the ...

Planation surfaces are an old-fashioned topic in geomorphology, but they are nevertheless important where they make up much of the landscape. Northern Ethiopia is largely a stepped topography, caused by differential erosion.
