toxicity, which may be due to a direct effect on non-tumor tissue or the body's reaction to the treatment's direct damage of tumor cells. Imaging can play a major role in the assessment of anticipated and, occasionally, the unanticipated toxicity of cancer treatment. Treatment-induced toxicity is reported on a grading scale from one to five [1].

likelihood of tumor regrowth that normally would have been available only upon actual regrowth (10–30 days post treatment) in a xenograft tumor model, was available within 24 -hrs of treatment using PAI, thus making early intervention a possibility.

Prediction of Tumor Recurrence and Therapy Monitoring

Standard treatment in several types of cancer. Therapeutic effects are often assessed with imaging. The main purpose of response assessment is to define resectability and determine surgical approach. Another controversial purpose of response assessment is selecting patients with complete tumor regression for non-operative strategies.

Background Anti-programmed death-1 (PD-1) treatment for advanced non-small-cell lung cancer (NSCLC) has improved the survival of patients. However, a substantial percentage of patients do not respond to this treatment.

Tumors continually shed DNA into the blood where it can be detected as circulating tumor DNA (ctDNA). While this phenomenon has been recognized for decades, techniques that are sensitive and specific enough to robustly detect ctDNA have only become available recently.
