political advertising works (and in some cases fails to work). In what follows, I argue that analysis of how political advertising uses the audiovisual and narrative conventions of the formulaic genres of popular culture (such as the horror story, family melodrama, and satire) can enhance our understanding of how viewers process campaign spots.

Abstract: A key element in the way political advertising conveys meaning to viewers is the holistic evocation of familiar forms (or genres) of popular culture through broadly recognizable packages of audiovisuals and narratives. Because viewers engage such recognizable forms through what cognitive scientists refer to as "top-down" processing, admakers can rely on viewers to "fill in the blanks" consistent with the form, and in ways that tap deep persuasive emotion.
