emergent settings. In addition, risks from cumulative radiation exposure have recently received more widespread attention [1, 2, 4-7]. Awareness of radiation risk is making its way into routine medical practice and may play a larger role in future utilization re-view and preapproval regulations [1].

Cancer risk models and their relationship to ionizing radiation are discussed. There are many model assumptions and risk factors that have a large quantitative impact on the cancer risk estimates. Other health end points such as mental retardation may be an even more serious risk than cancer for those with in utero exposures.

Scientists evaluate and estimate radiation risk using several assumptions that, taken together, may lead to a range of hypothetical health risk estimates for any given exposure scenario. For radiation protection purposes and for setting radiation exposure limits, current standards and practices are
