Sensory reeducation exercises simply reteach your brain how to interpret your senses. Just like you can do physical therapy exercises to regain movement after stroke, you can do sensory reeducation exercises to regain sensation after stroke.

Sensory Reeducation Exercises After Stroke - Flint Rehab

Sensory re-education is a technique therapists use in attempt to retrain sensory pathways or stimulate unused pathways. Therapists also teach adaptive techniques to help compensate for sensory loss. Sensory re-education techniques can include touching different textured objects, massage, vibration, pressure, determining joint position, identifying different temperatures, and electrical stimulation.

Sensory Re-education and Stroke classic sensory re-education when the protective sensation threshold was restored. All participants received a patient education booklet and were submitted to the modified Duran protocol for flexor tendon repair.

Conclusion: Although some clinical improvement was observed, mirror therapy was not shown to be more effective than late sensory re-education in an intermediate phase of nerve repair in the hand.

Sensory Re-education Sensory re-education is a way to help you to recover from your hand injury if your nerves have been injured. It should help to teach you how to recognise different textures and shapes with your injured hand. If you have any questions or need further information, please do not hesitate to contact your hand therapist.

Effect of Sensory Re-Education after Low Median Nerve

Special sections are devoted to hand sensation, sensory re-education and sensory re-learning after nerve injury and repair with emphasis on evolving concepts of brain plasticity mechanisms.

An adaptation of sensory re-education, mirror box therapy, has successfully been used with patients with phantom limb pain, hemiparesis after stroke, and complex regional pain syndrome type I. Patients have regained functionality and mobility with reduced pain and evidence of cortical reorganization of the primary somatosensory cortex that paralleled their clinical improvement (71).

REEDUCATION OF SENSATION IN THE HAND AFTER

The design of sensory re-education programmes has not changed for several decades. The purpose of this paper is to review evolving concepts in neuroscience and cognitive science, present a rationale for a modified approach to classic sensory re-education, and suggest new strategies for enhanced sensory re-learning following nerve repair.

Sensory Re-education Today and Tomorrow: A Review of Sensory re-education is well established as a therapeutic method for nerve repair²⁹, however it is not advocated by most therapists³⁰ as part of early phase retraining with sensory substitution when no re-innervation has occurred. Although few studies have addressed this approach, interest has improved in the area.
