Glutathione, the most abundant cellular thiol, provides the major antioxidant defense mechanism in all mammalian cells by neutralizing toxic peroxides (e.g. hydrogen peroxide formed from oxygen metabolism). Glutathione is known to be consumed more rapidly, and depleted, upon ingestion of certain medications and environmental toxins.

occurs. You can imagine the importance of glutathione in cell cytosol to safeguard metabolic processes. Glutathione concentrations are very tightly controlled, both within and outside the cell. A decrease in functional glutathione, GSH, signals the cell to produce more enzymes which synthesize glutathione and glutathione peroxidase.

Given the diverse roles of GSH in cellular physiology, the clinical importance of altered glutathione homeostasis is gaining well-deserved attention.

Glutathione: Physiological and Clinical Relevance

Abstract. Glutathione plays a key role in the liver in detoxification reactions and in regulating the thiol-disulfide status of the cell. Glutathione synthesis is regulated mainly by the availability of precursor cysteine and the concentration of glutathione itself which feeds back to regulate its own synthesis.

Glutathione (or GSH) is the body's own master antioxidant discovered way back in 1889. However, it was only about 30 years ago that the scientists began to understand its functions and discovered how to raise its levels.
