structures, query evaluation strategies and architectures for Spatiotemporal Database Management Systems (TDBMS). 1. Introduction Many data objects in the real world have attributes about location and time. For example, a database about sea turtles records the location and time data for turtles that carry radio transmitters.

temporal database management, and 3D/4D database support. A comparison of the prototype systems and a brief résumé conclude the chapter. 7.2 Architectural Aspects To support spatio-temporal applications, the adequate design of a system architecture for a spatio-temporal database management system (STDBMS) is crucial.

Spatial data management is often combined with temporal data management, because in many cases one needs to record the temporal evolution of spatially-related entities. The resulting data models are thus termed spatio-temporal data models.
