Actual alienation can only occur in and from something that is inaccessible to the mind instead of in and from something that is the mind. I would therefore conclude that the traditions which facilitate an unconscious articulate the problem of alienation more distinctly as alienation has no real place in a purely conscious being.

Social alienation is "a condition in social relationships reflected by a low degree of integration or common values and a high degree of distance or isolation between individuals, or between an individual and a group of people in a community or work environment". It is a sociological concept developed by several classical and contemporary theorists. The concept has many discipline-specific uses, and can refer both to a personal psychological state and to a type of social relationship.
