or to a much smaller dose of daylight. In many museum displays serious fading of most dyes would occur in less than fty years. There is no very effective way of reducing the rate of fading. Ultraviolet absorbers over light sources give a worthwhile increase in light-fastness to most, but not all, dyes. Low relative humidity reduces fading.

Dark fading and light fading are entirely separate phenomena. In Kodak Ektacolor paper, for example, magenta is the most stable of the three image dyes in dark storage, but it is generally the least stable when exposed to light. Dark fading proceeds in combination with light fading when prints are displayed. 4.

The light we have in Christ is a fading light; we are not assured that history as we know it will remain, and it may be nearing its end. Feel the urgency of following and using that light while we can.

fading or staining when kept in the dark under normal room temperature conditions). Dark Fading and Staining versus Light-Induced Fading and Staining This chapter deals with the fading and staining that may occur when color film and print materials are stored in the absence of light â€” that is, in the dark.
