The Fixation of Belief premises A and B the conclusion, the question is, whether these facts are really so related that if A is B is. If so, the inference is valid; if not, not. It is not in the least the question whether, when the premisses are accepted by the mind, we feel an impulse to accept the con-latter is a calm and satisfactory state which we do not wish to avoid, or to change to a belief in anything else. On the contrary, we cling tenaciously, not merely to believing, but to believing just what we do believe. Thus, both doubt and belief have positive effects upon us, though very different ones.

And it is clear that nothing out of the sphere of our knowledge can be our object, for nothing which does not affect the mind can be the motive for mental effort. The most that can be maintained is, that we seek for a belief that we shall think to be true. But we think each one of our beliefs to be true, and, indeed, it is mere tautology to say so.

Peirce's "The Fixation of Belief" The purpose of inquiry is to move from doubt to belief. Belief is a mental state in which there is no doubt. A belief may cease to be held and lead back to discomfort in the (former) believer, so the best kind of belief is the settled and stable kind. Inquiry itself is the struggle to attain belief.
