Melanocytes in skin are melanin-producing cells that are derived from the neural crest. They migrate during embryological development and local ... mediators such as tumor necrosis factor, NO, and interleukin-1, which participate in the activation of various antimicrobial mechanisms (Murray and Wynn, 2011).

However, the importance of the melanin as a virulence factor for C. albicans remains to be firmly established. Melanin could function as a virulence factor on several levels (Jacobson, 2000). It is a strong antioxidant and could absorb oxygen free-radicals that are produced by the host.

Melanin content and the production of melanin by uveal melanocytes in vitro apparently are influenced by racial and genetic factors because uveal melanocytes from a black donor showed significantly higher melanin content, rate of melanin production, and tyrosinase activity, as well as larger melanosomal size, than seen in uveal melanocytes ...

Substantial Effect of Melanin Influencing Factors on In

All factors connect Melanin produces itself in two forms; epidermal melanin, melatona, and neuro-melanin, ceratona. During the night the pineal gland produces melatona and during the day it produces ceratona.

The Science of Melanin - SlideShare

Melanin is brown, non-refractile, and finely granular with individual granules having a diameter of less than 800 nanometers. This differentiates melanin from common blood breakdown pigments, which are larger, chunky, and refractile, and range in color from green to yellow or red-brown. In heavily pigmented lesions, dense aggregates of melanin can obscure histologic detail.

Mammalian melanocytes locate in the basal layer; they do not keratinize but produce melanin pigments. 7 Melanin is produced from L-tyrosine (L-Tyr) with the aid of enzymatic reactions by tyrosinase (Tyr), Tyr-related protein (Typr)-1, and Typr2. 8 Most epidermal melanocytes migrate to the hair follicles and colonize hair matrix melanocytes in hairy general body (i.e., trunk) skin in animals.
