Variable Star Astronomy, formerly published as Hands-On Astrophysics, was developed for anyone who is interested in astronomy and in learning more about the behaviors and properties of stars. The conversion of the curriculum to electronic format has been completed for the Student Manual and the Teacher Pages.

Variable stars are frequently divided into five main classes: the intrinsic pulsating, cataclysmic, and eruptive variables, and the extrinsic eclipsing binary and rotating stars. Generally, long period and semiregular pulsating variables are recommended for beginners to observe.

than Epsilon. Is it between the two, closer to the brighter star or closer to the dimmer star. Estimate the brightness to a tenth of a magnitude. You can use binoculars or naked eye. When you locate the variable field, identify the variable and comparison stars that are closest to the current magnitude of the variable. Be patient.

1. Six-digit number of the variable star in the internal numbering system of the GCVS (the first two digits are the ordinal number of the constellation, and the last four digits the variable star's number in the constellation). 2. GCVS name. 3. Equatorial coordinates J2000.0, rounded to 0.1s in right ascension and 1 in declination. 4.
