Volcaniclastic facies are defined by distance from source, type of transporting agent, environment of deposition, and in some cases, by composition. First-order volcaniclastic facies are generally defined by position of the rock body relative to source within non-marine or marine environments, e.g., proximal, medial and distal facies.

Both subaerial and subaqueous facies of steeply dipping cone strata are present; the latter provide a rare example of subaqueous fall-fed grainflow deposits. Erosion of the growing cone by waves and runoff rapidly shifted tephra to form the platform, which consists of lacustrine volcaniclastic beach spit, lagoonal, and local deltaic deposits.
